

Comment from Daniel Terrien

Car prices have increased exponentially over the past couple decades. I and most people I know, am tired of paying (directly or indirectly) for technology that we do not want or need. Most of this technology is sold as necessary for safety, but just as with most such technology, it just allows people to drive more carelessly. We are trading our liberty for a false sense of security and paying more for it along the way. This technology and what it brings is not welcomed by most average American drivers and the benefits are really for those big companies that are forcing it upon us, such as insurance companies, car manufactures, big technology and wireless firms. I strongly oppose any mandate for two-way connected communications in cars.
